Considerations for healthcare professionals managing the family carer. The ever increasing global burden of communicable disease creates enormous demand for family carers. Families need to be involved in planning of care, responding to emerging changes in health and in disease, providing an important service to the individual and society. Caring for a relative can be a stressful role and one that may have adverse impact on the health and well-being of the carer. Intrinsic factors such as temperament, coping and emotional intelligence may play a part. Knowledge of this as well as the ability to work with the family can help carers to manage effectively. This review considers the need for strategies to support health professionals in the care of this group. Predictors of treatment outcome in socially anxious student and native Mandarin speakers. This study explored the predictive value of psychiatric, personality, and social anxiety disorder (SAD) symptoms on treatment outcome in social phobia (SP) patients. A non-random sample of socially anxious (n = 24) and non-socially anxious (n = 24) Mandarin speakers was recruited from a prospective study at a local mental health center. Patients completed self-report measures of SAD and anxiety, personality, and social variables three times during the course of their therapy. Clinical interviews were used as criterion measures of treatment effectiveness. With the exception of gender and years in school, the mean pretreatment SAD and anxiety symptom severity levels were not significantly different between socially anxious and non-socially anxious participants. Social anxiety, gender, and depression were significant predictors of treatment outcome. Attention to the role of gender differences and the assessment of depression in SAD treatment of socially anxious speakers may enhance treatment effectiveness. The Rockford Police Department is investigating a homicide that occurred Tuesday morning on Chicago Avenue in the city's Rockford Village neighborhood. According to the department, officers responded to the area for a 911 call around 10:30 a.m. The report indicated an unknown person shot at someone several times.
